THE BACK OFFICE FOR BUILDERS

The Digital Launch Kit.

Name it. Claim it. Get found. Let the robots answer.

Starting a construction firm, or dragging an existing one online properly, involves the same dozen decisions: the name, the domain, the email, the website, the Google profile, the reviews, and now the AI that can answer your phone while you pour concrete. Most builders make these decisions once, in a rush, in the wrong order. This kit is the right order, in plain English, with the honest costs attached.

CHAPTER 01

The digital launch on one page.

Twelve decisions in the right order. Everything after this page is the detail; this page alone prevents the classic regrets.

THE 30 SECOND VERSION

- A domain and a professional email address are the two non-negotiables, and together they cost under 30 pounds a year.
- Your Google Business Profile is free and decides whether you appear in the map pack, where most local work is won.
- Reviews compound: ask every completed customer, at handover, with one tap. Volume and recency both count.
- Answer the phone. Most trades miss around a third of calls, and fixing that is cheaper than any advertising.

	THE SHORT VERSION
Name	Sayable, spellable, memorable, and legally yours: check Companies House, the trademark register, the domain and the social handles BEFORE the van gets painted. Twenty minutes of checks prevents the two rebrands that cost real firms real money.
Ground	Register the .co.uk (and .com if free) in YOUR name, not a web designer's. Set up you@yourfirm.co.uk the same day: three pounds a month buys the credibility a 2009 hotmail spends daily.
Shopfront	A five-page mobile-first website built to rank for your trade in your town: from about 500 pounds done properly. Then a complete Google Business Profile, because the map pack is where local calls actually come from.
Proof	Reviews, asked for at the moment of handover, replied to always, faked never. Count, rating and recency drive both the algorithm and the customer.
Robots	An AI receptionist answers every call 24/7 from about 79 a month; a website chatbot books jobs at midnight from 29; receipt-reading AI kills the shoebox. Machines carry the grunt work; a human keeps the judgement.
Money	Business bank account on day one, bookkeeping software from the first invoice, and MTD-ready habits before HMRC makes them mandatory. The companion guide covers that whole world free.

WHY THIS ORDER

The order matters: name before domain, domain before van livery, email before the first estimate, website before ads, profile before review-begging, and the money stack underneath from day one. Everything in this kit sequences into the 30-day plan on page 14.

CHAPTER 02

Naming a firm that works.

The name outlives the van, the logo and probably the marriage. Three tests, four styles, and the traps that catch half the trade.

The three tests every good trade name passes.

- Sayable: it survives being said down a phone in a noisy merchant's. 'Hartley Building' passes; clever spellings and puns that need explaining fail daily, one confused caller at a time.
- Spellable: a customer who heard it once can type it into Google and get YOU. Every K-for-C and dropped vowel is a leaked enquiry to whoever owns the sensible spelling.
- Memorable at the right size: distinctive enough to recall, plain enough to trust. Trades trade on reliability: a name can be characterful, but it must never sound like a risk.

The four styles that work, with the honest trade-offs.

STYLE	EXAMPLE SHAPE	WORKS WHEN	WATCH FOR
Surname	Hartley & Sons Building	Trust and locality carry you; family firms; word-of-mouth trades.	Common surnames collide: check the register hard.
Place + trade	Tamar Valley Roofing	You want the town's searches; strong local SEO head start.	Caps your patch: expanding beyond the place reads odd.
Quality word	TrueLine Contracts	You want to look bigger than one van; commercial bidding.	Generic-sounding names are crowded: the checks matter most here.
Invented / blend	Kestrel Build Co	You want ownable, brandable, domain-friendly.	Must still pass the phone test: invented is not licence for unspellable.

Sole trader or limited: the naming rules differ.

A sole trader can trade under almost any name without registering it, but must not imply limited status ('Ltd'), use protected words, or pass off as an existing business. A limited company's name is checked and reserved at Companies House, must be unique on the register, and sensitive words (Chartered, Royal, Engineering in some contexts) need permission. Either way, the practical rule is identical: the checks on the next page decide whether the name is really available, whatever the legal wrapper.

THE SHORTCUT

Generate candidates fast with the free brand name generator at klyara.com/tools: trade plus town plus style, eight options a click, each linked straight to a live domain check. Ten minutes replaces the pub argument.

CHAPTER 03

The four checks before you commit.

Twenty minutes, in this order, before you fall in love. Every step is free and every skipped step has a horror story attached.

CHECK	WHERE	WHAT YOU ARE LOOKING FOR
1. Companies House	gov.uk company name search	Exact matches and too-close matches, live OR dissolved. A dissolved firm with debts and your name is a reputation you inherit by accident. Check even as a sole trader: you may incorporate later, and the name needs to be free when you do.
2. Trademark register	gov.uk trademark search	Registered marks in construction classes (37 is building work; 42 covers some services). A hit does not always kill the name, but a letter from a lawyer after the van is painted costs more than the search.
3. The domain	any registrar's search	The .co.uk at minimum. If it is taken by a live competitor, walk away from the name. Parked or squatted: sometimes buyable, usually a sign to keep generating.
4. Social handles	the platforms themselves	Matching or near-matching handles on Facebook and Instagram (plus the platforms your customers use). Consistency is findability: 'HartleyBuildSW' everywhere beats four different fragments.

What to do with a near-miss.

A similar-but-not-identical name in a different county is usually survivable for a sole trader, risky for a limited company, and always worth five minutes of thought about confusion: could a customer, supplier or reviewer plausibly mix you up? If yes, the name costs you enquiries forever. Generate three more candidates; the generator is free and the paint is not.

LOCK IT IN

Pass all four and act the same week: register the domain immediately (pennies), grab the handles (free), and if going limited, incorporate or at least check again before the signwriter books you in. Availability is a snapshot, not a reservation.

CHAPTER 04

Domains and email: own your ground.

04

The cheapest, most neglected assets in the trade. Two rules, one credibility upgrade, and the rescue job we perform weekly.

Rule one: your name on the registration. Non-negotiable.

The domain must be registered in YOUR name with YOUR email as the contact, whoever sets it up. The most common digital rescue we run: a web designer vanished years ago, the domain is expiring, the site is hostage, and the firm's email is about to bounce. There are formal transfer and dispute routes, and we win them, but the whole saga is prevented by one form filled correctly on day one. If someone else 'handles it', get the login and check the registrant field this week.

Rule two: .co.uk first, .com too if it is free.

For a UK trade, .co.uk is expected, trusted, and usually available: 15 to 20 pounds a year. Take the .com as well when it is free (pointed at the same site) purely so nobody else can sit on it. Newer endings (.builders, .london) are fine as extras, odd as the main address on a van. Keep the name short, skip hyphens, and match the firm name as exactly as the checks allowed.

Email: the three-pound credibility upgrade.

dave1987@hotmail.com on an estimate whispers 'one man, maybe insured'; dave@hartleybuilding.co.uk says 'established firm' before a word is read. Professional email on your own domain costs 3 to 5 pounds a mailbox monthly, migrates your history in, sets up on your phone in minutes, and the old address silently forwards for as long as you like. Add info@ and accounts@ as free aliases and the firm looks properly staffed. Of everything in this kit, this is the highest credibility-per-pound.

GROUND FIRST

Buy the domain the day the name passes its checks, even if the website is months away: it can hold a one-page 'call us' site and working email immediately. Ground first, buildings later: you are in construction, you know this.

CHAPTER 05

The website that wins work.

Not a brochure: a 24-hour employee whose job is turning searches into enquiries. What it needs, what it costs, and the DIY question answered straight.

The five pages that do the work.

- Home: what you do, where you do it, proof you are real (photos, reviews), and a phone number that works on the first tap. Half your visitors are on a phone standing in the room they want changing.
- Services: one page per money-making service, written around the customer's search ('loft conversion Plymouth'), not trade jargon. These pages are what Google ranks.
- Gallery: real jobs from your camera roll, befores and afters. Stock photos are detectable at a glance and quietly corrosive: your slightly-wonky real photos outperform them every time.
- About: faces, story, and the trust furniture: insurance, memberships, years. People hire people; commercial clients screen for stability.
- Contact: form, number, email, area map, and ideally a booking calendar or chatbot, because the enquiry arriving at 11pm should not wait for 8am to be captured.

What it honestly costs, both routes.

DIY builders (Wix, Squarespace and kin) run roughly 10 to 25 pounds a month and can produce something respectable IF you have the evenings and the eye: budget 20-plus hours and expect it to look like what it is. A professionally built five-pager for a trade runs from about 500 pounds one-off, plus a care plan of 29 to 59 a month for hosting, updates, backups and edits. The build is not the product: the ranking foundations, the speed, and the person who updates it in March are the product. Whichever route: mobile-first, fast, and wired to your number.

THE ONLY BRIEF THAT MATTERS

The question that designs the whole site: when a stranger lands here at 9pm needing your trade, what happens next? Every page either moves them toward calling, booking or messaging, or it is decoration. Brief any web designer with that sentence and watch the quote improve.

Speed matters more than beauty: a slow site loses the visitor before your best photo loads, and Google demotes it besides. If your current site takes more than three seconds on a phone on 4G, that alone justifies the rebuild.

CHAPTER 06

Google: the profile and the map pack.

The map pack: the three firms Google shows above everything else: takes most local clicks. Getting into it is a checklist, then a habit.

The one-afternoon profile build.

- Claim and verify the free Business Profile at google.com/business: the verification postcard or video step filters out half your competitors on its own, because they never finish it.
- Primary category exactly right ('Roofing contractor', not 'Construction company' if roofs are the money), plus every secondary that genuinely applies. Category choice is the strongest single signal you control.
- Service areas set to the patch you actually want to drive, services listed with descriptions, hours honest (and holiday hours maintained: 'closed' on a Tuesday lunchtime reads as 'gone bust').
- Twenty-plus real photos at launch: jobs, van, team, premises. Profiles with regular photos get measurably more calls and direction requests; phones make this a zero-cost habit.
- The review link saved to your phone's clipboard app, because page 8 is about to make you use it weekly.

Why the map pack decides your phone.

Search any trade plus any town: the map with three firms sits above the normal results, and those three take the calls. Ranking there runs on proximity (fixed), relevance (your categories and content), and prominence (reviews, activity, links, consistency). You control two of the three levers completely. Weekly posts, fresh photos, steady reviews and a tidy, consistent name-address-phone across the web is the whole flywheel: none of it is clever, all of it compounds, and most competitors stopped pedalling years ago.

DO IT NOW

The audit that takes ten seconds: search your trade plus your town on your own phone right now. Not on the first screen? Every day of that costs calls, and everything on this page is the fix, in order.

CHAPTER 07

Reviews: the trust flywheel.

Count, rating and recency drive the algorithm; the same three drive the customer. The system is ask, reply, never fake.

Ask: timing beats technique.

The moment satisfaction peaks is handover: the kitchen works, the roof held through the storm, the invoice is paid. A text that day with a one-tap Google link converts at multiples of a request a month later. Script it once ('Thanks for choosing us! If you were happy, a review takes 30 seconds:') and send it every job without exception: the discipline, not the wording, is the system. Backfilling politely to the last year of happy customers at launch typically lands a satisfying first burst.

Reply: to every single one.

Replies are read by every FUTURE customer: a warm two-line thank-you shows a firm that cares; silence under praise wastes it; silence under criticism reads as guilt. For the inevitable grump: reply once, calm and factual, offer to resolve offline, never argue in public. Handled well, one bad review plus a classy response builds more trust than a suspiciously perfect wall of five stars.

Never: the three career-limiting shortcuts.

- Never buy or fake reviews: platforms detect patterns, penalties include profile suspension, and one exposure headline outweighs a hundred real stars.
- Never 'gate': filtering so only happy customers get asked violates platform rules. Excluding the odd genuine disaster manually is judgement; systematic filtering is fraud with extra steps.
- Never review-swap with mates in the trade: reciprocal five-star rings are trivially visible in the graph and taken down in batches.

faked, ever: the whole asset is that it is real

CHAPTER 08

AI, part one: the phone and the chat.

The two robots customers actually meet. What they genuinely do, what they cost, and the myths worth retiring.

The AI receptionist: your best hire never sleeps.

Modern AI answering is not the robot phone-maze you are picturing: it answers instantly in your firm's name with a natural voice, handles the conversation ('can you quote a garage roof this week?'), offers real slots from your diary, books the job, and texts you the summary before the caller has hung up. It takes every simultaneous call on a rammed Monday, works the 8pm emergency hours where profitable panic work lives, and costs from about 79 pounds a month: less than one missed job pays. The industry's dirty secret is how many calls to trades simply die in voicemail; this deletes that entire failure mode.

The website chatbot: the night shift for your site.

Trained on your services, areas and prices policy, it answers visitor questions at 11pm, qualifies the job (postcode, scope), and books the quote visit or captures the callback: a conversation instead of a form nobody fills in. From about 29 a month, installed on any existing site with one script tag. The design rule that keeps it trustworthy: it answers only from the brief you approved, and hands anything beyond it to a human instead of guessing.

Three myths, retired.

- 'Customers hate talking to robots': they hate NOT GETTING THROUGH. Answered-instantly beats voicemail every measured time, and honesty when asked ('I'm the firm's AI assistant') lands fine.
- 'It will say something stupid and cost me a job': briefed systems with escalation rules book the simple and flag the tricky. The risk sits in unbriefed novelty toys, not in properly configured tools.
- 'It is for big firms': the economics are best for the SMALLEST firms, where the owner IS the receptionist and every missed call is personally missed money.

THE HONEST TEST

Try before believing: any decent provider (us included) will spin up a demo trained on YOUR firm and let you ring it. Two minutes of interrogating your own robot settles the question better than any page of ours.

CHAPTER 09

AI, part two: the paperwork robots.

Less visible, more valuable: the machines that read, sort, chase and draft, and the one principle that keeps them safe.

Receipt reading: the ten-second habit's engine.

Photograph a trade-counter receipt and AI reads the supplier, amount, VAT and date, codes it to the right category and job, and files the image as evidence: ten seconds of your day, zero evenings of typing, and a complete expense record at year end. This one tool is why the shoebox era is genuinely over, and why MTD's digital-records rules (see the companion guide) are a habit rather than a burden.

The rest of the quiet crew.

- Invoice chasing: polite, escalating reminders that never forget and never feel awkward, with statutory late-payment interest cited when it comes to that. Construction is the UK's slowest-paying sector; a tireless chaser is structural, not optional.
- Bank reconciliation: feeds matched to invoices and receipts automatically, with only the oddities queued for a human. The bookkeeping equivalent of a labourer who never stops.
- Drafting: quotes for repeat job types, review replies, social posts from your job photos: drafted by machine, approved by you, sounding like you on a good day.
- Plain-English insight: 'you are owed 14 grand, mostly by two names' texted before the cash pinch, not discovered during it.

The principle that keeps all of it safe.

Machines for speed, humans for judgement. Anything that touches HMRC, a legal obligation or a big-money decision gets human review: at Klyara that is a rule, not a promise, and it should be your rule for any provider or any tool you drive yourself. On data: prefer UK/EU-hosted services, check the 'never trained on your data' clause, use two-factor everywhere, and remember the boring truth that most breaches are weak passwords, not evil robots.

THE SENSIBLE ORDER

Adoption order for a small firm: receipt reading first (instant payback), then the receptionist (biggest revenue lever), then chasing (biggest cash-flow lever), then the drafting tools. Each pays for the next; none needs you to understand the machinery, only the outputs.

CHAPTER 10

Social and content without cringe.

10

You do not need to dance. You need proof of work, posted consistently, and your camera roll is already full of it.

The camera-roll goldmine.

Every job you finish is content: the before, the after, the tricky detail, the tidy site, the wagon loaded at dawn. Ten seconds per photo, the same habit as receipts, and a month of jobs becomes a month of posts. Customers do not follow builders for entertainment; they check you LOOK ALIVE, proud and busy before shortlisting. Silence loses quietly; a steady feed of real work wins without a single word of salesmanship.

Where, what, how often: the minimum effective dose.

PLATFORM	WHY	CADENCE
Google profile	It is literally search: posts and photos feed the map-pack flywheel directly.	Weekly post, monthly photo batch.
Facebook	Where local homeowners recommend and vet trades; community groups drive real enquiries.	Two to four posts a month, plus replies.
Instagram	Visual trades (kitchens, lofts, landscaping) get chosen off the grid.	Befores/afters weekly; reels when you have footage.
LinkedIn	Only if chasing commercial and main-contractor work, where buyers check stability.	Monthly is plenty.

The recycling rule.

One good job produces: a Google post, a Facebook before/after, an Instagram carousel, a 30-second reel from the same footage, and a paragraph for the website's gallery: five outputs, one afternoon of raw material. Batch it monthly or hand the drafting to a service (ours runs from 99 a month); either way the calendar, not inspiration, does the posting.

THE FORMULA

The one caption formula that never cringes: what the job was, what made it interesting, one honest sentence of pride, area and trade words for search. 'Rear extension in Plympton: steel in on a tight access, plastered and handed over this week. Good one, this.' Done.

CHAPTER 11

Ads and SEO, honestly compared.

One buys the top of the page, one earns the map. Different tools, different clocks, one honest metric for both.

	PAID SEARCH ADS	LOCAL SEO / THE FLYWHEEL
Speed	Calls within days of launch.	Months to build, then compounds.
Cost shape	Pay per click, forever: turn it off, calls stop.	Effort and consistency: stops slowly, restarts slowly.
Best for	New firms with empty diaries; emergency trades; filling seasonal gaps fast.	Every firm, long term: the cheapest calls you will ever get are the ones you rank for.
Failure mode	Broad keywords burning budget on DIYers and job-hunters three counties away.	Six months of nothing because nobody kept pedalling the flywheel.
Judge it by	Cost per BOOKED CALL: not clicks, not impressions.	Rank for your money searches, plus calls and direction requests from the profile.

The sequencing most small firms should run.

Ads short-term while SEO spins up, then taper: turn the paid tap on for cash flow now (sensible local budgets start around 300 to 500 a month plus management), build the profile-reviews-content flywheel underneath, and reduce spend as earned rankings take the weight. Emergency trades often keep a small always-on ad for the 2am searches; everyone else treats ads as scaffolding: essential during construction, silly to rent forever.

Two honesty rules whoever runs your ads.

- Flat management fees beat percentage-of-spend: a manager paid a cut of the budget has a structural reason to grow the budget. Ask how they are paid before you ask what they charge.
- If it is not working, the report should say so: demand the cost-per-booked-call number monthly, and expect a professional to sometimes recommend spending LESS. Anyone who never does is selling, not managing.

FREE FIRST

Before spending a pound: get the free basics done first (profile complete, reviews flowing, site fast). Ads land on whatever exists: paying to send strangers to a broken shopfront is the most common marketing money bonfire in the trade.

CHAPTER 12

The money stack under it all.

The digital shopfront stands on boring foundations: an account, a habit, and software that keeps HMRC calm. One page, because the companion guide has the

- Business bank account, day one: not legally required for sole traders, practically transformative. One account where every line is business means the bank feed does your bookkeeping; a mixed account means deciding, one coffee at a time, forever.
- Bookkeeping software from the first invoice: recognised products (QuickBooks, Xero and kin) cost less monthly than a takeaway and mean your numbers exist as they happen: quotes, invoices, expenses, profit, all live. Retrofitting a year later costs many times more than starting right.
- The receipt habit: photograph at purchase, ten seconds, no exceptions. The same habit powers expenses, tax, MTD compliance and half the AI in this kit. It is the keystone.
- Know your MTD date: from April 2026 (gross income over 50k), 2027 (30k) or 2028 (20k), sole traders file quarterly from digital records. If that sentence is news, the free companion guide: Making Tax Digital for Builders: is written for you and costs nothing.
- Insurance before the first job: public liability minimum, employers' liability the moment anyone works for you (legally required), tools and van cover by circumstance. A construction-fluent broker beats a comparison site; introductions are the free kind of help.
- Price with the numbers, not the gut: day rate times days minus CIS minus real expenses is what actually banks. The free calculators at klyara.com/tools do this sum honestly in thirty seconds.

ONE AFTERNOON, FOREVER CALMER

The whole stack: account plus software plus habit: takes one afternoon and roughly 30 pounds a month, and it is the difference between a firm that knows its numbers and a firm that finds out in January. The launch plan overleaf schedules it into week one, where it belongs.

Deliberately short chapter: the money world has its own free 12-page guide (Making Tax Digital for Builders, at klyara.com/guide) covering thresholds, quarters, penalties, CIS and the secrets other guides skip. This kit builds the shopfront; that one keeps the till legal.

The 30-day launch plan.

Everything in this kit, sequenced into four weeks of evenings. Tick boxes included; excuses not.

WEEK	DO	DONE WHEN
Week 1: claim the ground	Run the name through all four checks (p4). Register the .co.uk in your name; take the .com if free. Set up you@yourfirm email; forward the old address. Open the business bank account; install bookkeeping software; start the receipt habit today, not Monday.	Name legally clear; domain and email live; first receipt photographed.
Week 2: build the shopfront	Commission or start the five-page website (p6): brief with the 9pm-stranger sentence. Gather 30 job photos from the camera roll; write the services pages around real searches. Claim the Google Business Profile and start verification the same day: the postcard takes days you should spend building.	Site in build; profile claimed; verification in progress.
Week 3: switch on proof and robots	Complete the profile: categories, areas, services, 20 photos. Launch the review system: script the handover text, backfill-ask the last year's happy customers. Trial the AI receptionist on a demo of your own firm; add the chatbot when the site ships.	Profile 100 percent; first new reviews landing; robot answering after-hours calls.
Week 4: fuel and rhythm	Publish the first Google post and first before/after set; diary the weekly posting slot. Decide ads honestly (p12): if the diary is empty, launch a tight local campaign; if not, bank the money and pedal the flywheel. Book the money-stack check: MTD date confirmed, insurance placed, calculators run.	A month of rhythm scheduled; every system from this kit alive and owned by you.

THE ARITHMETIC

Total cash to launch properly: domain and email under 10 a month, website from about 500 one-off plus care, receptionist and chatbot about 108 a month combined, everything else free plus evenings. Against one extra booked job a month, the arithmetic embarrasses the excuses.

CHAPTER 14

The toolbox: every link you need.

Search these exactly, or click from the online version of this page at klyara.com/resources. Never trust a PDF (even this one) over the live source.

Checks and registrations (all free, all gov.uk unless noted).

- 'Companies House search': names, live and dissolved · 'Search for a trademark': the register · 'Register for VAT' when the rolling 90k approaches
- 'Set up as a sole trader' or 'Set up a limited company': the legal wrapper, done properly · 'Employing staff for the first time': the seven steps before hire one
- 'Check employment status for tax (CEST)': employed vs self-employed, settled before it is expensive

The digital shopfront.

- google.com/business: the profile · Google's 'PageSpeed Insights': your site's honest speed score · 'UK domain registrars': any reputable one; just keep YOUR name on the registration
- Platform review policies ('Google review policy'): read once, never fake · The free Klyara tools: brand generator, domain finder, and every calculator: klyara.com/tools

Money and protection.

- 'Making Tax Digital for Income Tax' on gov.uk, plus our free companion guide at klyara.com/guide · 'Late commercial payments interest': what slow payers legally owe you
- British Business Bank and Start Up Loans: government-backed finance routes · FSB and the Federation of Master Builders: the bodies worth their subs
- The Pensions Regulator's employer duties: auto-enrolment from the first employee, no exceptions

THE LIVING VERSION

Everything on this page, clickable and kept current, lives at klyara.com/resources: fifty doors in five rooms, plus the guides library. Bookmark that instead of trusting paper.

A last word on sequencing: nothing in this toolbox matters until the name has passed its checks and the ground is claimed. Links age, principles do not: verify at source, own your assets, ask for reviews, let robots carry and humans judge.

CHAPTER 15

The bit where we mention ourselves.

Every chapter of this kit is also a thing we do. That is not a coincidence; it is the business model, and here it is in the open.

Klyara is a back office built only for construction: bookkeeping, CIS, MTD, payroll, phones answered and work won. Everything this kit taught you to do, we do for firms that would rather spend the evenings elsewhere: names checked, domains and email in YOUR name, websites built to rank, profiles and reviews run weekly, receptionist and chatbot briefed on your firm, and the money stack underneath kept HMRC-calm. AI carries the grunt work; a named construction specialist signs off everything that matters; and we never touch your money: payments always move from your own bank with your approval.

	WHAT	FROM
Ground	Domain, professional email, hosting watched daily	3/mo per mailbox, 15-20/yr domains
Shopfront	Five-page site built to rank, cared for monthly	499 build, 29-59/mo care
Proof	Google Ready profile build; review engine running	249 one-off; 39/mo reviews
Robots	AI receptionist 24/7; website chatbot; receipt AI	79/mo; 29/mo; included with books
Money	Bookkeeping, CIS, MTD, payroll: the whole till	Solo 59/mo to Pro 329/mo

Prices ex VAT, monthly rolling with 30 days notice, everything quoted in writing before you commit. Take one service or the stack; the introductions (insurance, energy, finance, banking, year-end) stay free either way, because some things you should not buy from us but still deserve someone good.

THE NEXT STEP

The free next step: a 20-minute call where we run YOUR name through the four checks live, audit your Google profile against your three nearest rivals, and price anything you want done for you. Book at klyara.com/contact or email hello@klyara.com. Bring the name; we will bring the honesty.

Share this kit freely with anyone starting out: it is free and it stays free. If it made us look like we know our trade, that was the marketing budget. © Klyara 2026 · general guidance · verify details at source · klyara.com
